Abstract*—Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) has become a way for businesses to help with social economic and environmental progress. In India CSR got a legal setup through the Companies Act, 2013. This law made it necessary for certain companies to do activities that help society. This paper looks at how CSR helps with growth. It focuses on education, healthcare, skills training, women's empowerment, rural development, jobs and protecting the environment. Inclusive growth makes sure that the benefits of progress reach people who are poor or left out. The study uses ideas from books, official papers, company reports and other sources. It looks at how CSR can help reduce inequality improve access to services make people stronger and create lasting jobs. The paper also talks about problems with implementing CSR. These problems include not people from the community taking part some areas getting more help than others not checking if the projects work, not being open about what is done and doing projects that only last a short time. The results show that CSR can help with growth if the projects are based on what the community needs can be measured, involve people and match with long-term goals. The paper suggests that more people from the community should be involved reports should be clear projects should be checked plans should last longer and companies, government and local groups should work together. Good CSR can then go beyond just giving money and become a way to help people grow in a lasting way.

I. INTRODUCTION

Economic growth is important when it helps people in society. Fast growth can happen at the time as poverty, joblessness, unfair access to education and medical care and differences between regions. Inclusive growth tries to fix this by making sure people take part have chances and can get basic services. It also helps improve the abilities of people who're in need.

Corporate Social Responsibility means that businesses take care of the society and environment they are part of. Modern CSR is more than giving money. It includes planned steps that help with problems and create long-term value for people and groups. In India the Companies Act, 2013 made rules for CSR for companies that meet conditions. The law listed areas such as education, health, reducing poverty helping villages, training and protecting the environment.

CSR can help with growth by using company money, skills, technology and connections to fill gaps in development. Companies can help people find jobs through training help them get education and health care support women who run businesses improve village roads and homes and help with green ways of doing things. The success of CSR depends on how relevant the projects are, how they are carried out how they are watched and how long they last.

This paper looks at how CSR helps with growth the main areas where it makes a difference the problems that stop it from working well and ways to make it better.

II. REVIEW OF LITERATURE

Most research sees CSR as something that has parts, like economic legal, ethical and social duties. Carrolls idea about CSR says that businesses need to do more than make money. They must follow the law act in a way and help others. Later studies connect CSR with working with people who care about the company making sure the company is good for the planet and creating long-term value.

Research on CSR in countries shows that it can help with missing public services and make life better for people. Studies have found that education, health, jobs, villages and helping women are the areas where companies can help. The research also says that when projects match what the community needs and involve people they do better.

Studies in India after the 2013 law show that CSR has changed from giving money to a more planned way of doing things. Researchers also say that there are problems. These include not checking projects some places getting more help than others not measuring the effects and some projects being more about spending money than about real results.

Overall, the research says that CSR can help with growth but it only works well if it is planned well people are involved it is clear and it is checked.

2.1 Need for the Study

Even though the economy has grown many groups still do not have access to education, health care, jobs, training, money and basic buildings. The government alone may not always do enough for every problem. Companies have money, good management, technology and networks that can help projects.

The study is needed to find out how CSR can be used better to help more people grow. It also helps to see what conditions make CSR work well and create results instead of just temporary help.

III. OBJECTIVES OF THE STUDY

- To look at what Corporate Social Responsibility's why it is important in India.
- To understand how CSR is connected with growth.
- To find the areas where CSR helps with helping more people.
- To look at examples of CSR projects that help groups.
- To find the problems with making CSR work for growth.
- To suggest ways to make CSR projects work better and last longer.

IV. RESEARCH METHODOLOGY

The study uses a way of thinking and describing things based on information from books, articles, official papers, company reports and other sources. The study uses a way of looking at ideas to find patterns about CSR, helping people building communities and growing in a way. No one is asked directly. This method is good for understanding how CSR helps with growth.

V. CORPORATE SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY IN INDIA

India has a way of handling CSR because the Companies Act, 2013 made rules for businesses that meet certain conditions. Section 135 and the list in Schedule VII set out what companies must do.

Important areas for CSR include education and training, health and clean water helping people helping villages making sure women are treated fairly protecting the environment and helping people who are in need. This system made companies plan their work better and report what they do. The way CSR works in India has both projects started by companies and help from groups and local places. The success of these projects depends not just on how much money's used but on whether they really help people improve their lives. So, watching what happens checking the effects being open and involving people are important.

VI. CSR AND INCLUSIVE GROWTH

Inclusive growth means that when the economy grows, people who're poor or left out get a chance to take part and get the benefits. CSR can help with this in ways.

Education and training help people learn skills and get better jobs. Health projects help people get care. Woman’s programs help women earn money make decisions and be more independent. Projects for villages help build roads, water, toilets, internet and jobs. Environmental projects help protect the land that poor people rely on. CSR can also help by supporting businesses helping people start their own work helping people understand money and teaching new skills. When projects are made to fit what the community needs, they help people move from being dependent to being active in the economy.

VII. ROLE OF CSR IN PROMOTING INCLUSIVE GROWTH

CSR helps with growth in five main ways.

- People’s skills and health improve when companies spend on education, scholarships learning health care and training.

- Projects that help people get jobs start businesses. Support local work helps them earn more money.
- Programs that help women learn things; support groups teach them to understand money and help them work can make them more powerful in their lives.
- Projects that improve roads, water, homes and internet help make villages better. Help people in them.
- Projects that use energy protect the land manage waste and use resources better help communities and protect the future.

These ways show that when CSR projects are made to help people in a way they can help companies and society work together better.

VIII. CASE STUDIES / EXAMPLES

8.1 Tata Group Education and Community Development

Tata Group companies have been working on projects that help with education, health, jobs and villages for a time. These projects show how companies can use their money and help with groups to deal with many parts of development.

8.2 ITC Rural Livelihoods and Sustainability

ITCs work has included helping people in the countryside helping with farming saving water and taking care of the environment. Their way shows how CSR can help people earn money and also protect the planet.

8.3 Reliance Foundation Healthcare, Education and Rural Development

Reliance Foundation has worked on projects that help with health, education, villages helping after disasters and community work. These projects show how big CSR programs can help many different people get better. The examples show that the best help comes when CSR programs include getting help from people, building skills working with local people and helping for a long time.

IX. FINDINGS

The study found important points.

CSR can help with growth by making education, health, training, jobs and village buildings better.

Programs that help people learn and get jobs can make them work better and earn money.

Projects that help women can make them work more. Be more powerful in their lives.

Projects that help villages can make the gap between cities and villages

Environmental work can help people today. Also protect the future.

When people in the community take part, the projects are better and more accepted.

How well CSR works is not just about how much money's spent but, about real changes and long-term effects.

Not doing things well not checking on them not being open and making projects that last a short time can make CSR not work.

X. SUGGESTIONS

Companies should check what the community really needs before starting CSR projects.

CSR projects should aim for long-term results of just spending money every year.

Companies need to make their impact assessments stronger by using measurable social indicators. Local communities need to be involved in the planning the actual work and the checking of results. Corporate Social Responsibility efforts should match the Sustainable Development Goals and the local development goals. Companies need to be more open by sharing information about their activities, who they help what results they get and what challenges they face. Partnerships between companies, government groups, non-profits, schools and local organizations should be made stronger. More focus should be placed on rural areas and people who are left behind to reduce the differences between regions.

XI. CONCLUSION

Corporate Social Responsibility can become a tool for growth that includes everyone and is lasting in India. By supporting education, health, skills, jobs, helping women, rural areas and protecting the environment companies can help improve the lives and chances of people who are struggling. The study shows that Corporate Social Responsibility works best when it is based on needs includes people is open can be measured and is made to have a lasting effect.

Moving from old-style giving to community-focused Corporate Social Responsibility can make the relationship between business and society stronger. At the time Corporate Social Responsibility should support instead of take the place of what the government and public groups should do. More teamwork, checking and tests based on evidence are needed to make sure that Corporate Social Responsibility money reaches the people it is meant for and makes a lasting difference.

In the end making sure everyone grows together needs all of us to take part. Businesses, government organizations and communities need to work to make things fairer and help more people have better chances. When companies use their skills to help with social problems Corporate Social Responsibility can go beyond just following rules and become a real way to help everyone grow in a good and lasting way.
